This book is a slightly edited version of my dissertation and its publication concludes a period during which I experienced the support of many different people both professionally and personally. Thanking everyone appropriately may well be the hardest part in this endeavor – I shall try anyway.

My thanks first and foremost go to my advisors, to Professor Alfred Hornung, who has guided my work at Johannes Gutenberg University and from whose longstanding expertise and experience, especially in the field of life writing research, I have benefited immensely. Professor Johannes Völz of Goethe University Frankfurt has not only advised and commented on this project from day one, but also accompanied my academic journey from the very beginning. He significantly shaped my learning, reading, and thinking during the years I spent studying and working with him – years marked by intellectual challenge, appreciation, and encouragement – and I am deeply thankful for all of it.

I conducted a large part of the research for this book during my time as a member of the DFG-funded Research Training Group “Life Sciences – Life Writing.” I thank the speakers Professor Mita Banerjee and Professor Norbert W. Paul as well as my colleagues for creating a vital research environment that always sparked inspiring discussions. I also thank my former colleagues at the Institute of English and American Studies at Goethe University, for their comments on parts of this book which I presented in several research colloquia. Furthermore, I thank my former students, with whom I discussed some of the memoirs and thoughts in my 2019 seminar on the Memoir Boom at Goethe University Frankfurt. A great thank you goes to Professor Sidonie Smith at whose invitation I was able to spend a profoundly productive research semester at the University of Michigan and who commented on this project at a very early stage. Towards the end of writing this dissertation, I started working at the University of Bremen. Thank you to everyone in the department of Professor Heinz Rothgang, across the health sciences, and especially in the He:Ku network for supporting me on the final stretch.

I count myself extremely lucky to have met many people on my academic path and the various byways I discovered especially during my time in Frankfurt – people who not only became friends but also shaped my thinking tremendously in countless discussions in seminars, reading circles and other contexts. I am grateful to all of you. Being a friend to someone who is writing a dissertation is not always easy – all the more reason to thank friends and roommates for being there and for spending countless library days, lunch and coffee breaks as well as evenings with me: Anna, Arwin, Beate, Christoph, Clara, Elena, Flo, Joel, Kerstin, Lisa, Lena, Sascha, Steff... A special thanks goes to Astrid, who became my close ally in this process, who has read and commented on my chapters and who dissected thoughts, sentences and paragraphs with me as many times as I deemed necessary.

For 20 years of friendship and unconditional support in every regard I thank Anna, Anna, Antea, Danica and Marie.

Thank you to my parents Daniela and Wilhelm as well as their partners Helmut and Moni for enabling me to pursue such a project and to push through the many difficulties and doubts the process entailed. I would not have been able to do this without your unwavering support and constant encouragement throughout my life.

Lastly, I thank Lian who has accompanied me on this way from when I first told him I was thinking about writing a dissertation over ten years ago until the finalization of the manuscript for publication. Thank you for accompanying me through all the ups and downs, for reading and commenting on each of these chapters and for always being absolutely sure that I will eventually finish this book.
