The greatest thanks are due to Tal Raban Mock, who was born in the middle of the writing process and multiplied my desire to write this book, but also brought me to consider its subjects from new angles. In the same breath, I would like to thank my sister, Charlotte Koch, and my father, Elmar Mock, for supporting this project unconditionally. I would also like to thank Theresa, Hugo, and Ben Bischof, as well as Joseph Kamaru, for their wonderful friendship, which was incredibly supportive for me throughout the process.

I sincerely thank all those who paved the way for me to meet the protagonists of this dissertation, including Kate Owino, Michal Kimani, Rogan Anjili, Ngene Mwaura, George Katete, Benson Agaya, Helena Funk, Séverine Marguin, and Ayami Awazuhara, and all the parents who trusted me to meet with their children. I want to thank the wonderful Lucy Tetu for introducing me to the mindset of hakuna matata whenever I lost hope during this project. Asante sana also to Jasmin Mahazi for teaching me some basics in Swahili. Thank you, Viv and all the residents of the Parklands compound, for making me feel at home for the first time in Nairobi. I want to thank all the taxi drivers in Nairobi, who were very kind research assistants to me, answering all my curious questions about the city on our rides. I thank Cindi Katz for her research and activist practice, which have been very inspiring to me.

In the context of my association with the Collaborative Research Centre 'Re-Figuration of Spaces' (CRC 1265), I would like to thank Eva Korte and Gunter Weidenhaus for three incredibly exciting and insightful years of joint academic work in the CRC's (first phase) subproject A05: 'Biographies of the Middle Classes: Spatial Experience and Meaning in the Life Course Narrative'. I would like to thank Gunter Weidenhaus for his generous trust and the freedom to realise my own project, which he supported and promoted with all the means at his disposal. I thank him for this, because he has maintained the openness that makes sociology joyful and keeps it critical. I thank Sophie Mélix, Janina Dobrusskin, Jona Schwerer, and Valentin Domann for the regular exchange, emotional and professional support, and critical discussions in our joint doctoral colloquium. I would particularly like to thank Séverine Marguin and Vivien Sommer, who, as colleagues but also as contemporaries in the simultaneity of motherhood and academia, actively stood by my side when the tension between the two caused me deep doubts. I would like to thank Martina Löw for her support and encouragement in promoting the topic of childhood in spatial sociological debates and for her incredible availability in all matters and at all times. Nina Eleseman and Rim Winker, thank you for supporting me with gender equality funds and helping me through the jungle of academic bureaucracy. Thank you Sarah Taylor and David Heyde for copyediting the text.

Thanks to the following people for the encouragement, discussion, and exchange: Clara Sondermann, Magdalena Böttcher, Christine and Vlad Barwick-Gross, Corinna Mehl, Paul Welch Guerra, Joanna Krawczyk, Nina Ludolphi, Joshua Schröder, Miro Born, Enise Incesoy, Eduardo López de Silanes.
