

sich Nikolić mit ihrer Studie dem (neuen) lateinamerikanischen Mittelstand zuwendet. Sie macht die gesellschaftliche Bedeutung dieser Bevölkerungsgruppe sichtbar, die innerhalb der Lateinamerikanistik in den letzten Jahren an Bedeutung gewonnen hat. Nikolić hat ein sprachlich sehr gut lesbares Buch vorgelegt, dennoch entstehen bei der Lektüre durch etliche Wiederholungen unnötige Längen. Zieht man in Betracht, dass die Themen "Essen" und "Küche" weltweit in hohem Maße gesellschaftlich mit den Lebenswelten von Frauen verknüpft und in Lateinamerika historisch als auch politisch von enormer Relevanz sind, so muss hier zweierlei kritisch angemerkt werden: Wiewohl sich die Arbeit nicht explizit der Lebenswelt von Frauen widmet, fehlt eine inhaltliche Reflexion, Verortung und Stellungnahme zu diesem Kontext. Zum anderen irritiert, dass es der Publikation an einer konsequent gegenderten Sprache fehlt, zumal Frauen die Mehrzahl der Informantinnen und Informanten ausmachen. Die Auseinandersetzung der Autorin mit der Bedeutung des "Tourist Gaze" für national-regionale Identitätenbildung ist von hoher Relevanz, eine weiterführende Auseinandersetzung mit wirtschafts- bzw. konsumanthropologischen Ansätzen wäre allerdings lohnenswert: Sie würde u. a. den Faktor der (neoliberalen) Ökonomisierung von Identitäten und Ethnizitäten (selling identities) beleuchten und damit die politische Bedeutung des Essens sichtbar machen.

Fazit: Die Publikation ist ein wertvolles, empirisch fundiertes Plädoyer gegen eindimensionale Identitätszuschreibung und für die Stärkung lokal-kulinarischer Diversität, das für alle sozialwissenschaftlich Tätigen, Lateinamerika-Interessierte sowie Studierende gleichermaßen aufschlussreich sein könnte.

Offutt, Stephen: New Centers of Global Evangelicalism in Latin America and Africa. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2015. 192 pp. ISBN 978-1-107-07832-1. Price: £ 60.00

This book takes a fresh look at the growing robustness of evangelical churches outside the United States, with a special focus on churches in El Salvador and South Africa. The author holds that these churches show the importance of what the author calls "religious social forces" (35) as one of the factors shaping the direction of developments in global Christianity.

Offutt provides detailed accounts of the leadership and activities of several of the churches in these two countries, and describes the general trajectory of their activities. He argues that to understand these developments, both global and local, social forces and actors must be taken into account. At the transnational level, Offutt highlights evangelical networking across borders in the form of connections with organizations like World Vision and Compassion International. However, the book also highlights the dynamism of local leadership, and of changes internal to the evangelical communities in the countries studied. Offutt notes several important recent developments in the evangelical Christianity of these two countries. One is that any local evangelical communities have shown an increasingly entrepreneurial approach to organization and activities (88 ff.). These organizations show themselves to be motivated by value-rational activity, and may also feature charismatic leaders.

Another important development is that the churches, especially in El Salvador, have shown themselves increasingly engaged in social activity and in politics. Actual evangelical political parties have not drawn evangelical support. But as evangelical communities have grown, their most entrepreneurially savvy leaders have sometimes gained access to elected officials.

A third important development is that the churches in these countries have been extending their reach internationally, both in the form of links to Christian communities elsewhere and in the form of increasing engagement in international missions (119). In so doing, these NCEs (New Centers of Evangelicalism) act as what Offutt calls "micro religious movements" – they have developed their own particular ways "of church planting, spiritual emphases, ways of singing, reading the Bible, or praying," and as they connect internationally they "are now trend setters as well as trend receivers" (123).

As noted above, Offutt explains these developments partly through reference to the notion of "religious social forces," which he alternatively calls "religious sources of change." These are processes "in which religious symbols, resources, actors, or organizations are in motion and setting other (in this case, religious) symbols, resources, actors, or organizations in motion" (35). Other forces, such as politics, social developments, and globalization, are also important factors, but Offutt argues that social religious forces are the "more immediate causes of key transformations" occurring within the New Centers of Evangelicalism (35).

Five basic principles are involved in Offutt's conception of the "religious social forces" framework: (1) Local actors are building what he calls the New Centers of Evangelicalism. (2) Religious forces from the West greatly influence those centers. (3) However, he notes, "[a]s local actors build social institutions and organizations, they organically synthesize local and global resources." (4) Local actors create more sustainable institutions and organizations than outsiders would, no matter how sympathetic the outsiders may be. And (5) although the global forces can be imperial in their effects, they can also be sources of local empowerment.

Consequently, Offutt is interested in "how individuals in NCEs express agency and have ownership of their own religious movement in the face of the tremendous power of global religious forces" (35). He focuses partly on the role of "entrepreneurs," in the strictest sense of the term, in synthesizing local and global resources in original ways that can sometimes benefit the larger society outside their church, though in other cases the entrepreneur role can be socially detrimental (36).

One of the new things about these Evangelical churches in El Salvador and South Africa, at least on the level of mega-church leadership, is the degree of interaction with international agencies and churches and also the degree of interaction with local political leadership. As noted above, there is also a tendency for these churches to become more socially involved than they had in the past. This is partly because the evangelical communities have become larger and somewhat more affluent.

The book's discussion of the activities and roles of the churches in these two countries also takes into account the historical, political, and social contexts within which they operate. Overall, the author is to be commended for striking a balance between local and global factors and actors, while seeking to place greater emphasis on the role of local actors and institutions than had previously been the case.

The author is to be commended for the wealth of detail, and for the straightforward manner in which it is presented. The theoretical and analytical frameworks used are primarily sociological, not anthropological. Nevertheless, the book is highly recommended to those interested in global evangelical Christianity, due to its rich analytical detail on how the evangelical churches in those two countries are functioning at the institutional and national level.

Perrin, Michel: Visions Huichol. Un art amérindien du Mexique. Paris: Somogy éditions d'art, 2014. 223 pp. ph. ISBN 978-2-7572-0816-8. Prix: € 35.00

In 2014 the Museum of African, Oceanic, and American Art of Marseille had a exhibition of yarn paintings (Spanish: tablas de estambre) of the Huichol (Wixarika) of Western Mexico. The show was based mainly on the private collection of Juan Negrín (Oakland, CA), but also included some other funds of Huichol art, like the one of the French filmmaker François Reichenbach. Michel Perrin, the curator and author of the catalogue, is an ethnologist mainly known for his work on the Wayuu of Northern Colombia. His "Le chemin des indiens morts. Mythes et symboles goajiro" is considered a classic. In the late 1980s and early 1990s Perrin also conducted some fieldwork among the Huichol of Tateikie, a community high up in the mountains of Jalisco, which resulted in a couple of articles. Recently he visited the Huichol again, but now the urban community of Zitakua, in Tepic, the capital of the state of Nayarit, where many of the Huichol artists live and create.

Several aspects of the present catalogue indicate that Perrin did not get very deep into Huichol ethnography. He does not know or quote most of recent bibliographies, not even the ones published in French; his writing of Huichol terms is completely arbitrary; and he never acquired a feeling for Huichol political etiquette. He complains that during his fieldwork in Tateikie the governor of that community took away his camera, so he only could do ballpoint-drawings (13). Had nobody explained the French ethnographer that in most Huichol communities it is not allowed to take photos, often not even to conduct fieldwork, without a formal permit given by the community government? And they do not confiscate photographic equipment just to bother visitors, but to enforce respect for local law. The Huichol are famous for defending their political autonomy and their territories.

With all its flaws, Perrin's catalogue is useful for several reasons. The chapter on the making of yarn paintings is of certain ethnographic value; and some great yarn paintings are published for the first time, in acceptably good quality. Actually the catalogue reproduces several artworks that were not included in the Marseille exhibition. The strong emphasis on yarn painting may be justified for some aesthetical reason. Nevertheless, the lack of references to all other genres of Huichol art, like textiles and beadwork, is puzzling. The way yarn paintings are interpreted is disappointing. Perrin simply endorses the approach developed by symbolic anthropologists and art collectors of the 1970s, like Peter T. Furst and Juan Negrín. Yarn paintings are basically understood as illustrations of "myths," and an effort is made to establish an iconographical system that allows the spectator to decipher at least the less complex artworks. Recent studies by Olivia Kindl, Regina Lira, and myself have pointed into quite different directions, not taken into account in this catalogue. Huichol commercial art production of all kind often quotes ritual chants, and also there is a tendency to reproduce the structure of traditional offerings. Chanting and offering are interrelated activities aimed at the complexification of relations between humans, animals, ancestor deities, and other beings, including artifacts and artworks endowed with their own agency. The very peculiar style of Huichol art, which is partly figurative or narrative, partly abstract or psychedelic, can be related pretty well to the ambiguities of ritual experience. But those aspects are not dealt with in this catalogue.

Les cultes des génies de l'eau et les cérémonies qui leur sont réservées détiennent une place fondamentale dans les cosmogonies traditionnelles d'Afrique centrale en général et dans la région du bassin du Congo en particulier, en témoigne l'ancienneté des termes qui les désignent et leurs distributions sur le continent africain. Ils sont parfois confondus à tort, dans les arts et cultures populaires, avec les représentations des mami wata d'Afrique occidentale et des Caraïbes mais avec qui ils n'ont pourtant que très peu en commun. Les génies de l'eau sont traditionnellement peu représentés plastiquement, ils n'existent pas ou peu de masque ou de statues à leurs effigies. Si dans les chants et les contes qui font leurs louanges, on leurs donne une apparence blanchâtre, élanée aux cheveux longs et lisses, celle-ci n'est jamais vraiment clairement définie, tout simplement, parce qu'il n'est pas donné aux humains de les apercevoir.

On leur attribue divers pouvoirs "plus qu'humains" tels que la polymorphie ou l'ubiquité, mais c'est davantage leurs pouvoirs nourriciers et protecteurs qui sont appréciés, leurs présences assurent davantage le bien-être de la communauté. Chez les populations Punu, on recon-
