This book is the revised version of my doctoral thesis, submitted to the Faculty of Economics and Social Sciences, University of Hamburg, in summer 2019. The years that have led to the completion of this study have often felt like a lonely journey. However, I know that this is a fallacy. I would have never had the opportunity to write these words if it were not for the stimulation and support of all those people that have decided to accompany me on this path. For that, I am deeply thankful, and I hope that I will find many opportunities to return the favour in one way or the other.

The financial and ideational benefits of a scholarship from the Rosa-Luxemburg-Stiftung, throughout my years of study and for my dissertation, have enhanced my scope to concentrate on understanding (and changing) the world that we live in. Moreover, I am grateful that I was able to witness the final days of the great Hamburger Universität für Wirtschaft und Politik – before its relentless liquidation that still fills me with indignation. The students and lecturers at the HWP have shaped my conviction that science should never be an end in itself but a stimulus of social progress and tool for political emancipation. At the University of Essex, I was able to learn the width and depth of sociological thinking from Yasemin Soysal and other highly dedicated scholars. With Wulf D. Hund, I have found (back in Hamburg) a doctoral advisor whose exceptional knowledge and analytical skills had already guided me through my early studies. For his advice and patience, I am very much obliged.

Many thanks also to Stefanie Affeldt, Simone Borgstede, Malina Emmerink, Malte Hinrichsen and Benjamin Opratko for the fruitful regular discussions at our doctoral colloquium at the University of Hamburg, and to Robert M. Burroughs for inviting me to the research network 'The Congo Free State Across Language, Culture, Media'. The comments and criticism on these like all other occasions where I talked about my work in progress were much appreciated.

My colleagues and fellow doctoral candidates at the MBA 60 Fernando de Almeida, Dennis Pauschinger, Clemens Reichold, Stephanie Rose, Phyllis Levin and, in particular, Eric Bityili bi Nleme, who kept me company in my office, significantly reduced the hardships of secluded research. For their careers and personal future, I wish them all the best.

Friends, comrades and flatmates are too many to name. I owe them the fact that Hamburg became home, and I am grateful that they admitted me to their lives. Moreover, there can hardly be enough words to describe how important my mother is to me. She alone brought me up, educated me, encouraged me, conveyed me her wisdom and values and made me the person who I am. For that, and not only her generous practical support, I will forever be grateful. To her, my grandmothers, and the father and grandfathers I never got to know, this book is dedicated. The last lines I want to devote to the persons that have become the centre of my life: I thank Marla for her pictures and songs that have greatly cheered me up. And Sarah for all the beautiful hours and mutual dreams and the love that she allows me to feel.
