

Acknowledgments

To be one is always to become with many.
(Haraway 2008: 4, emph. in orig.)

For a seed to grow into a plant that blossoms and eventually produces new seeds, a lot of collaborative labour and labourers are essential. Light, water, pollinators, fertile soil, bacteria, and other living organisms are indispensable to the vegetal life cycle. Similarly, this book has grown out of a deeply relational process of learning, questioning, searching, assembling, weaving, doubting, unravelling, rethinking, and reweaving. It would not have become what it is without the many others who have supported and nourished this process – especially since it came to life in a time of many troubles shaking both the world at large and my very own personal world. I am deeply grateful to all the people who accompanied, inspired, and encouraged me on this journey, many of whom inhabit these pages without the citational credit others have received.

This book is a revised version of my doctoral thesis, which I have submitted to Goethe University Frankfurt in June 2024. First, I want to thank my supervisors, Thomas Lemke and Susanne Schultz, for their generous support, friendly guidance, and stimulating challenges. My sincerest appreciation also goes to my interview partners and other informants who have kindly agreed to share their knowledge with me. These encounters have enriched my thinking in more ways than the passages quoted throughout this book can display. I thank Viona Hartmann and Paula Stiegler for their support in transcribing the interviews. My ethnographic research trips were made possible by the kind support of the Vereinigung der Freunde und Förderer der Goethe-Universität (Association of Friends and Sponsors of Goethe University), the GRADE Center Social Sciences, GRADE Center Gender, and the Department of Social Sciences at Goethe University.

I could not have written this book, nor would the process have been so joyful without the relentless encouragement, unparalleled support, and great friendship of Josef Barla, Katharina Hoppe, Vicky Kluzik, Christoph Panzer, and Lucas Schucht, who have provided crucial comments on several of the chapters and offered invaluable help in figuring out the final structure. I am further deeply grateful to other colleagues and friends who have encouraged and supported me in the past years through (mutual) proofreading and collaborative analysis of empirical material, in-depth discussions and spontaneous conversations, joint events and collective writing sessions: Sophie Bauer, Julia Böcker, Marleen Boschen, Veit Braun, Franziska Dahlmeier, Endre Dányi, Karin Dick, Constanze Erhard, Andreas Folkers, Louka Maju Goetzke, Julia Hartleb, Viona Hartmann, Anastassija Kostan, Anna-Katharina Laboissière, Sara Lafuente-Funes, Ruzana Liburkina, Ruth Manstetten, Carolin Mezes, Pierre Louis du Plessis, Nils Richterich, Markus Rudolfi, Jonas Rüppel, Eva Sänger, Luki Schmitz, Laura Schnieder, Aline Theobald, Annika Troitzsch, Peter Wehling, Tobias Wagner, Leon Wolff, Franziska Zirker, and Ira Zöller.

I would also like to express my gratitude to Ursula Münster for inviting me to join the Oslo School of Environmental Humanities as a visiting researcher in the spring of 2023 and affording me the chance of many inspiring encounters and conversations. I thank the students who have participated in the seminars I had the pleasure to teach at Goethe University over the past years and the participants of the Biotechnologies, Nature and Society Colloquium for inspiring discussions and collaborative learning. I would also like to thank the colleagues I worked with in the Women's and Gender Equality Council of the Faculty of Social Sciences at Goethe University between 2019 and 2021, who taught me a lot about the power of working in an atmosphere of feminist solidarity. A special thanks goes to Renate Uhrig and Angelika Boese for administrative and technical support always infused with care and compassion. I thank Julian Koptisch and Moritz Dapper for their editorial support and Gerard Holden for copy-editing the final manuscript.

My heartfelt thanks also go to my friends and family who shared the many challenges as well as the joys of the past years with me. I want to express my deepest appreciation to my partner Wolfgang, whose unrelenting care, confidence, enthusiasm, humour, and love, more than anything, have carried me through this journey with all its ups and downs. Finally, no words can express the gratitude I feel for my beloved mother Katja, whose unbearable loss I had to survive amidst all of this. You taught and never stopped encouraging me to follow my curiosity, trust my gut, speak my mind, and maintain my wit even in the most disheartening of times. You will forever be my greatest source of inspiration.