

Acknowledgments

Five years is too long to work on something alone. This book has benefited from valuable inspiration, input and refinements from a group of mentors, colleagues and loved ones.

My first supervisor, Christopher Daase, helped me find the right conceptual key to open up the necessary analytical scope for an innovative resistance analysis, while remaining theoretically sound. His advice was crucial in helping me to integrate the work into the existing research corpus and to relate it to the overarching issues of our discipline, thus ensuring that I did not lose sight of the scientific objective and investigative added value of my study.

Jochen von Bernstorff was the one who convinced me that my thoughts on the subject could have sufficient academic relevance and substance for a doctoral thesis. Our early discussions, before I made the decision to pursue a doctorate, sparked my interest in critical and post-colonial perspectives and boosted my confidence to take on a legal-sociological approach. Throughout the process, he kept my mind alert to the strategic instrumentalization of international law by nuclear rulers and anti-colonial resisters.

Without Andreas Hasenclever, his scrutinizing review of the research design and drafts and his justifiably challenging questions, I would have had significantly less chance of prevailing in the competition for a doctoral position and ultimately qualifying for a successful degree. Time and again, his roguish skepticism sharpened my analytical eye, for example, to identify the “subversive” character of the Humanitarian Initiative, enabling me to plow through hard empirical ground with precise arguments.

Among the many esteemed colleagues at the Peace Research Institute Frankfurt (PRIF) who have dealt with my research question and methodology in colloquia, workshops and bilateral discussions, and who have discussed with me the consistency of my analysis or the guidelines and evaluation tools for the interviews, I would particularly like to mention Ben Christian, Antonia Witt and Felix Bethke. Stefan Kroll supported me with tips for communicative and professional introductory and concluding chapters as well as with the publication process. Viola Niemack ensured lasting morale and motivation in PRIFs Security Policy Department and provided indispensable assistance in organizing and funding project-related guest and field research stays.

My collaboration and exchange with the team from the University of Tübingen's Collaborative Research Centre "Threatened Orders", which works on arms control in the United Nations system, ensured that my research on nuclear weapons remained connected to the broader debates on political struggles in other regimes and categories of weapons, drawing exciting and generalizable ideas from them. In addition to Jochen von Bernstorff and Andreas Hasenclever, this pool of inspiration includes Thomas Nielebock, Charlotte Kehne, Enno Mensching and Jacob Thaler.

I owe a debt of gratitude to the entire Arms Control Negotiation Academy (ACONA) team, in particular the members of the Executive Board and the Curriculum Group – Arvid Bell, Mariana Budjeryn, Pia Hansson, Christopher Daase, Christian Ostermann, Adlan Margoev, Lev Sokolshchik and Auður Birna Stefánsdóttir – for keeping my faith in the relevance of arms control and cooperation on the basis of interest-driven negotiations alive throughout my doctoral studies, despite the Covid pandemic and the war in Ukraine. What is more, through our own efforts, we have proven that this conviction can be pursued and maintained even in the most adverse times and amidst considerable political hurdles.

The empirical jewels of this work are the in-depth interviews with diplomats and representatives of civil society. To extract them was only possible because all these people, whose busy schedules are packed with pressing commitments, generously granted me their precious time and trust. I am deeply grateful for their sincere esteem of and participation in the research about their own sphere of influence. Seth Shelden, Daniel Högsta, Celine Nahory and Alicia Sanders-Zakre from ICAN provided essential help in accessing the field and establishing contacts with these high-profile interviewees, as did distinguished senior scholars such as William Potter and Zia Mian.

My special thanks go to the review commission I convened shortly before submission. In addition to individuals already mentioned, this included Céline Prest, who lent more literary verve and depth to some chapters, Antonia Wolff, who thoroughly checked comprehensibility and structure, Sophia Wirsching, with her trained eye for consistency and the study of civil society activities, as well as Daniel Brimbal and Claas Frohn, who, with their sharp minds and scientific expertise, rounded off the rapid yet solid review process.

Benedikt Heusler-Krug, who was doing his doctorate at the same time as me in non-university Wiesbaden, helped me to set up a kind of scholarly safe space and scientific working atmosphere there during the pandemic. Kevin Goeke deserves credit for dressing up the brittle and prudish scientific jargon in these ingeniously revealing illustrations, which instantly offer profound insight into the subject: The naked emperor, who initially stands above the law and affirms his power with a nuclear imperial regalia that functions as a cache-sex, is tied into the threads of international law by the end of the book. This image takes up a central theme that was addressed in the interviews about the patriarchal dominance within the nuclear order.

Last but not least, my heartfelt thanks go to my brother André, who was instrumental in maintaining the necessary level of self-discipline and who was available as a steady interlocutor for the most critical and trivial questions that arose in the course of the research project. He was also a reliable master of ceremonies and culinary curator for the gathering after my disputation.

Five years of research and an open access publication not only consume a lot of mental effort, but also cost a lot of money. I would like to thank the Peace Research Institute Frankfurt (PRIF) for the trust they placed in me as a Scientific Fellow in the research program “Perspectives of Arms Control” sponsored by the German Federal Foreign Office and the generous funding of my project, including field studies, travel and a grant for the publication through the PRIF Open Access Fund. I would also like to thank the Leibniz Association for ensuring optimal conditions for independent and interdisciplinary research and for subsidizing this book through the Leibniz Association’s Open Access Publication Fund (monographs).
