Studies in Medieval and Renaissance Book Culture

This series presents studies related to medieval manuscripts and early printed books. The scope is broad and includes the production and use of these books, their readers, and their physical appearance. An emphasis of the series is to discuss material features of the objects and to do so in relationship to the cultural-intellectual context of the period.

Preface

The essays in this volume are devoted to the production and use of the Latin classics between 800 and 1200. As with the previous books in this series, the manuscript, both as an object on the desk of the scribe and in the hands of the reader or editor, informs the overarching perspective from which the studies engage with their material. The essays by Irene O'Daly, Mariken Teeuwen, and Rodney Thomson are expanded and revised papers read during the colloquium 'Writing the Classics', organised by my research project 'Turning Over a New Leaf: Manuscript Innovation in the Twelfth-Century Renaissance' on 3 September 2013 in collaboration with Leiden University Library. The essays of David Gura and Robert Babcock were written specially for this volume, and I wish to thank both authors for their generous contribution. My own essay, which springs from a discovery made in Leiden University Library in the fall of 2012, was also specially written for this volume. I wish to thank Leiden University Press for their continued help and encouragement in expanding the 'Studies in Medieval and Renaissance Book Culture' series and Jenny Weston for copy-editing the essays in this third volume.
