

Table of contents

Abstract | 11

Keywords | 12

Acknowledgements | 13

Prologue | 15

1 ‘Playing around’ with children’s outdoor play | 19

Embeddings: The URBAN study | 20

Aim | 21

Research questions | 23

Placing ‘obesogenic landscapes’ | 24

Moving beyond passive participation with children’s geographies | 27

Defining ‘play’ and ‘physical activity’: two sides of the same coin? | 30

Conceptualising ‘environmental literacy’ | 33

An attempt to define neighbourhood | 35

Thesis overview | 37

2 ‘Obesogenic landscapes’ in children’s geographies:
mapping key debates and perspectives | 39

Urban children’s outdoor play insights from ‘obesogenic landscapes’ | 41

Shaping ‘obesogenic landscapes’: experiencing seasonality
and weather conditions | 63

Conclusion | 69

3 A conceptual framework for understanding children’s seasonal outdoor play:
Bourdieu and affordances | 71

Bourdieu’s key concepts: field, capital and habitus | 72

A Bourdieusian lens on space and place | 79

Complementing the Bourdieusian lens with ‘affordances’ | 87

Conclusion | 95

4 ‘Methodological principles’:
a Bourdieusian approach to unpack outdoor play | 97

Applying Bourdieu’s ‘methodological principles’:

transcending the ‘existing’ paradigm divide | 99

	Bourdieu, mixed-method research and children	106
	Conclusion	112
5	The research practice: procedural principles	 115
	Recruiting families	116
	Placing families	120
	The research practice: introducing the methods	121
	The analysis stage	135
	Conclusion	145
6	Locating Auckland Central and Beach Haven	 147
	Auckland's climate and weather	147
	'A localisation' of Auckland	148
	Conclusion	160
7	The social history of play:
	Auckland a city of managed childhood?	 161
	Shanghais and tea parties: paradoxes of the (un)managed childhood of the early days	162
	Meaningful pastime: supervising children's free time in the beginning of modernity and war times	164
	Play and well-being in the post-war period: the suburban nuclear family	169
	Children's play and the feminist movement	171
	Pluralism or individualisation of play? Neoliberal tolls on children's play	173
	Conclusion	175
8	The inhabitation of Auckland Central and Beach Haven:
	a parental pursuit	 177
	Structuring the appropriation of Auckland Central and Beach Haven	178
	Conclusion	190
9	'Profits of localisation' for outdoor play in Auckland Central and Beach Haven	 193
	Children's map-able roaming patterns	195
	Families' views of 'desirable agents and goods' and their promising 'symbolic capital'	202
	Conclusion	223
10	Spaces of points of view:
	the logics of outdoor play in summer and winter	 225
	Outdoor play and the 'practical logics' in actualising affordances	226

Habitus and seasonal outdoor play | 242

Conclusion | 260

11 Struggles in the ‘field of play’:

five insights into understanding

and explaining ‘obesogenic landscapes’ | 263

Making the most of Beach Haven: stories of an outdoor tomboy | 266

Limits in Beach Haven? Curtailing the outdoor habitus | 275

Making the most of the central city: stories of a sports ‘enthusiast’ | 283

Adjusting a passion for active play to the central city: stories of a gamer | 289

Coming out of hibernation: the suburban paradox | 297

Conclusion | 302

12 Closing, refurbishing and re-opening the ‘play grounds’ of ‘obesogenic landscapes’ | 305

Closing and refurbishing the thesis’ ‘play grounds’

of ‘obesogenic landscapes’ | 306

Future playgrounds for researching ‘obesogenic landscapes’ | 317

Concluding remarks | 321

References | 323

