Completing this work required an effort similar to that needed when hiking up a mountain, whether on boots or skis, and with or without a rope and harness. It was filled with ups and downs, fluctuating between a lack of motivation and an inability to stop. These two experiences, my academic work and hiking, provided practice for one another, as I learnt in one what I needed for the other. Both require a clear mind, mental strength, determination, and endurance. However, one does not only require strength for this endeavour, one also gains it; at times, one lacks motivation and must regain determination; at other times, one is hungry for food and must take a break to eat; or one becomes hungry for more input. Hiking and writing are iterative processes that do not always feel like uphill battles; in addition to detours, there are sections where you feel like you are going downhill before reaching the peak. However, any good mountaineer knows that mountains, particularly daunting ones, should not be climbed alone. To those who accompanied me on this adventure and supported me as best they could on my way up, I want to express my deepest gratitude.

I embarked on this climb with Michaela Schäuble at the Institute for Social Anthropology at the University of Bern, and Priska Gisler at the Institut Praktiken+Theorien der Künste at the Bern Academy of the Arts, who have accompanied me from the beginning, helped me find my way when I became lost, and guided me to ensure that I remained on track.

This endeavour would not have been possible without the open-mindedness of Michael Griesser, and that of his team, whom I met in the framework of my research, namely MA students Kate Layton-Matthews and Julian Klein, field assistants Camille Toscani and Marine Quintin, and, most recently, Miya Warrington, who has also joined Michael's project as Principal Investigator, as well as the Siberian jays I encountered. When doing fieldwork together, we were not only an ethnographer and interlocutors but also companions climbing actual hills together, which enabled me to collect empirical data and gain the insights on which this book is built, and without which none of this could have been written.

I would also like to express my deepest gratitude to Cristina Grasseni who gave me inspiring and supportive feedback on my thoughts that were developed based on her concepts. I am particularly grateful to Irene Vögeli and Patrick Müller at the Zurich University of the Arts. I would like to thank Irene Vögeli and Hannes Rickli in particular, who introduced me to the field of art–science, helped me gain access to Michael Griesser's project, and mentored me throughout.

There were and are many more people involved in this process. I would like to mention the members of the Zeichenwerkstatt, which is run by Sigrid Adorf at the Zurich University of the Arts, my peers in the PhD colloquia at the Graduate School of the Arts at the University of Bern and the Art Academy of Bern, which I was able to join. In terms of feedback on my writing process, I want to thank Franz Neff for his advice on improving my writing. Thank you Klub Galopp for the design and transcript Verlag for turning this manuscript into a book which I can hold in my hands now.

I am grateful to my parents and my friends for their support during this process, and particularly to my companion, Sean, who accompanied me on literal mountains and nudged me forwards when I was close to giving up just below the peak. Thank you for always being there for me, encouraging me, and challenging me to conquer new peaks. Thank you, Ulysse, our latest family member, for making me look behind corners I had forgotten existed and making me discover the world with you anew, far from any disciplinary constraints.

Lastly, it was these moments in the mountains when things fell into place, thoughts came together, and concepts arose. Therefore, I cannot help but also thank the mountains for bearing with me as companions, and challenging and motivating me. They taught me what it means to persevere and helped me return to the piles of books and writing waiting for me on my desk with a fresh perspective and new ideas.
