Acknowledgement

My six year journey underlying this research project, which started in Germany and finally brought me to the USA via several long field research visits to Bosnia and Herzegovina, would not have been possible without the consistent help and guidance by my family, good friends, colleagues, and several research institutions that hosted this project; or without generous support from the FAZit Stiftung of the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung.

A special thanks goes to Professor Oliver Kessler who supported this project from its very beginning back at the Geschwister-Scholl-Institut for Political Sciences at the Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität in München. I was extraordinarily fortunate to then find inspiration and guidance from Professors Andrea Bartoli and Rom Harré during my time in Washington, DC, who both became inspirational mentors for me. Many thanks in this regard also goes to my first academic mentor, Professor Ferdinand Kramer, who encouraged me to explore the academic path to begin with. I am further very thankful to Professors Roland Bleiker and Bo Christensen for reading and commenting on different chapters of this dissertation, and to Eleftherios Michael for introducing me to the field of conflict analysis and Bosnia way back in 2008.

Professor Fathali Moghaddam, whose invitation later brought me to Georgetown University's Departments of Government and Psychology, and who time and again offered me new opportunities to discuss and share my findings, deserves special thanks as well. And so does Professor Dennis Sandole, for inviting me to the School for Conflict Analysis and Resolution at George Mason University, Professor Brendan O'Leary, for supporting my visit as a pre-doctoral fellow at the University of Pennsylvania's Department of Political Science, and Sabina Čehajić-Clancy for my time at the Balkan Institute for Conflict Resolution, Responsibility, and Reconciliation, at the Sarajevo School for Social Sciences and Technology. Further, I am grateful to the Graduate School for the Humanities at the University of Groningen for hosting this project in the interim, before I found a new academic home at the Staatswissenschaftliche Fakultät der Universität Erfurt.

This study would not have been possible without continuous encouragement from many friends, colleagues, and office companions over the years: Thanks Alex, Manana, Sarah, and Natalie! Of course there are so many people to thank in Bosnia and Herzegovina; without these individuals' support, local knowledge, and hospitality my field research would not have been successful. Big thanks to my dear friends Azra and Vjeko for introducing me to their country and for opening many doors. Finally, I owe my biggest thanks to my wife Jacquie – the first reader of this study – your comments and support time and again encouraged me to continue with this project.

In the end, of course, this study is solely my learning process, full of detours, accidental discoveries, and subjective interpretations. I therefore take the full responsibility for every mistake and misrepresentation of local realities that might have occurred.
