Writing a dissertation tends to be a lonely process. However, I was by no means alone in it. Turning in this thesis would not have been possible without the academic and emotional support of many people—peers, colleagues, supervisors, friends, comrades and family—to whom I am deeply thankful.

My first thanks go to my supervisor, Prof. Dr. Mathias Bös, for his support, guidance, and patience. I am grateful for his approachability and active engagement while also allowing me to make this project my own journey. As part of this journey, we travelled together, starting the research as a team of three, including PD Dr. Nina Clara Tiesler. I thank her, among other things, for her guidance in conducting field research and for sharing her wisdom about what a PhD project entails at crucial moments. I thank my second supervisor, Prof. Dr. Regina Bendix, for her research. I am highly influenced by her helpful commentaries and words of encouragement. The environment in her doctoral colloquium in Göttingen crucially shaped the project's final stages and gave me the momentum to approach its finish line. The editing work of Dr. Kirsty Kay was essential to turning the dissertation into a book I felt worthy to be published.

Conducting this project would not have been possible without the help of my student assistants. Carola Steenhoff conducted field research, opening doors in Cuxhaven that I could not open without Portuguese language competencies. Julia Frisch cleaned up my mess of references and citations in the last weeks before I handed the thesis in.

I thank my colleagues from the research Project CHER. Special thanks go to Jenny Hagemann, Malte Kleinschmidt and Raimund Lazar for our discussions and joint attempts to approach the study of cultural heritage. My colleagues from the working group on sociological theory and the Institute of Sociology at the Leibniz Universität Hannover for providing me with a supportive and joyful work environment.

Catharina Peeck-Ho was tasked with reading the whole thesis; she was also among the first to help me take myself seriously as a scholar. Big thanks also go to all the other readers of parts of my thesis for really engaging with my work: Friederike Beier, Jenny Hagemann, Anna-Lisa Klages, Vasiliki Belia, Sarah Beck-lake, and Franziska Meyer-Lantzberg. I thank my feminist mother's writing group for being there online every day to keep up my motivation to write. And the Working Group Situational Analysis, which accompanied my research process from its initial phases. I learned about rigorous research from you and found a space for being "nerdy" about Situational Analysis.

Finally, I must thank my friends, comrades, family, neighbours and chosen family for their emotional and structural support. Some probably still wonder what I did in this thesis; others became conversation partners, shaping the research and writing process. All of you went along with me through the ups and downs, doubts and breakthroughs. You also reminded me of that beautiful life outside of academia; special thanks in this respect go to my child, Lu Jeldrik. Ingo, you are my partner, friend, lover and coach. I have no words for the job you do. I learned so much about the importance of caring communities, and I thank you all for being mine.
