This book is a revised version of my doctoral dissertation, which was accepted at the Faculty of Philosophy, Eberhard Karls University of Tübingen in 2016.

My long-term research interests arose from my Magister thesis. Prof Christoph Reinfandt at the University of Tübingen helped me to see the potential of my Magister thesis for further research and encouraged me to pursue and develop the idea of literary documentary. He also introduced me to Bruno Latour's scholarship. While Latour has been the boon and bane of the past few years, I am very grateful to Christoph for having enormous amounts of patience while I tried, tested and wrestled with Latour's work, and for the innumerable ways in which he supported me in the different phases of being a graduate student. He has been a steady and reliable mentor to me, always open to exploring even my more unorthodox ideas, and helped me shape them into what is now this book.

I owe a very crucial revision in my thesis to the points raised by Prof Ingrid Hotz-Davies in her official report on my doctoral thesis and our subsequent discussion during my viva. I am grateful to her also for all those times when she patiently read different parts of my thesis, commenting them with her minimalistic question marks, whys, whats and smilies. The thesis has profited immensely from all the right questions Ingrid asked that have guided me throughout. Many insights for the close readings have also arisen from the classes we conducted together. Thank you for all the opportunities you "afforded" me – pun intended!

I would like to thank the Landesgraduiertenförderung Baden-Württemberg for funding my research project. I especially appreciate their principle of non-interference in the development of the project itself, as it gave me the necessary intellectual and personal freedom to pursue the different paths that have led to this book.

In lieu of financial support, I express deep gratitude to the Gleichstellungsbüro and Universitätsbund Tübingen for funding my conference trips that gave me the academically stimulating and much appreciated international exposure.

I would like to express my utmost appreciation to the FAZIT Stiftung for their generous contribution towards the publication of this book.

I must thank Oona Grimes for permission to use an image of her etching of Hackney. Thanks also to Iain Sinclair for our exchange via email and permission to use “anything I needed” from his book. I want to thank Sam Miller for our exchanges that helped me understand his book better, and for his permission to use one of his brilliant, hand-drawn maps of Delhi. I am also grateful to Patrick Neate, who answered my questions on his book with much clarity and patience.

Over the past few years at the university, I was part of an inter-disciplinary colloquium. I am grateful to all the people who participated in it and reviewed my contributions. This was an essential and useful activity for my research results. A big whoop and thanks to some of my friends who helped me by never really trying to analyse or understand my choice to go down the academic path. We got along splendidly anyway, or maybe because of that. A special thanks to Sonja and Albina, my dear friends and partners in crime, for their love and support from the beginning of my time here in Germany.

I thank Frank, my husband, for his unending patience and loving support, and especially for reminding and showing me that there is more to life, for indulging my whims, and for always buying me flowers. Lukas, “my darling piece of the moon” as we say in India, my besty, my jaan, my pride, has been my mood-upper so many times, and it is because of him that I have learned more discipline in my life. Without Gudrun and Werner, my in-laws, I would not have finished my thesis. I am ever grateful for their unconditional love and support – please know that I appreciate everything you are and do for me from the bottom of my heart. I owe a big thank you to Patrick, my dear, oh-so patient and highly skilled brother-in-law, for taking the time to understand what I mean and for all those precious hours that he put into making this book aesthetically viable. I cannot even begin to tell what an inseparable part of me my sister, Gitanjali, is and that having her makes me a stronger person. Finally, I dedicate this book to my parents. They have given me strong roots and wings. Without them, I would be nothing.
