My interest in how forcibly displaced people are represented in contemporary art and how art can foster a deeper understanding of refugeedom germinated in 2010–2014. At that time, I served as the leader of the Danish-based but transnationally connected Network for Migration and Culture and was engaged in co-organizing several international conferences on the interrelationship between migration, culture and the arts, including the conference Displacements: Forced migration and the arts held at Aarhus University in 2013. However, what transformed the burgeoning interest in forced displacement that I developed from listening to the many eye-opening presentations at the conferences into a long-lasting engagement with the topic was an artistic and activist initiative emerging from the Danish art scene. With the arrival in Europe of hundreds of thousands of refugees from the Syrian Civil War during the 'long summer of migration' in 2015, the need to understand how Europe hosts refugees became urgent. This refugee situation led many artists and cultural workers across Europe to initiate art projects about refugeedom, most notably participatory projects with refugees and asylum seekers.

In Denmark, the most enduring and important project was the community centre Trampoline House in Copenhagen. In 2015, I attended the opening of its embedded gallery CAMP / Center for Art on Migration Politics. The tireless efforts of the sprawling community of Trampoline House and CAMP to develop dignified ways to interact with and represent people with a background of forced displacement provided the decisive impetus for writing this book. I owe this community a huge debt of gratitude, especially Tone Olaf Nielsen, Frederikke 'Fred' Hansen and Morten Goll, who have generously shared their insights with me over the years.

I also owe a warm thank you to Sabine Dahl Nielsen for our many illuminating conversations when co-authoring an article on CAMP's curatorial and activist practice, to which the present study is indebted. A special thanks goes to Moritz Schramm whose generous feedback and constructive criticism helped me develop my premature thoughts of writing about 'refugees in art' into a sustainable idea for a book.

This book has been a long time coming, and it would not have evolved into a proper research project without the engagement of a number of colleagues, friends and family. It is a pleasure to thank them for valuable dialogues and for broadening my outlook. I would also like to extend this gratitude to the institutional home base supporting my endeavours, the Department of Arts and Cultural Studies at the University of Copenhagen. In particular, I would like to thank Gunhild Borggreen, Mathias Danbolt, Anna Meera Gaonkar, Kerry Greaves, Eva la Cour-Nielsen, Mikkel Bolt Rasmussen, Mette Sandbye, Sarah El-Taki, Cecilie Ullerup Schmidt and my peers in the department's intergenerational research cluster, Global Entanglements. My thanks also to the students of Modern Culture who have attended my course on cultural history over the past five years. The openness and curiosity of students enabled this course to serve as a productive testing ground for various approaches to and perspectives on art, culture and forced displacement.

Dialogues with other scholars and friends further afield have sometimes had to be continued at long distance and through digital formats, or resumed at irregular intervals when our paths crossed. These conversations have nonetheless contributed both directly and indirectly to this study. I would thus like to thank Cathrine Bublatzky, Jane Chin Davidson, Burcu Dogramaci, Monica Juneja, Virginia Magnaghi, Birgit Mersmann, Marsha Meskimmon, Tijana Mišković, Sten Pultz Moslund, Nina Möntmann, Pierluigi Musarò, Alpesh Kantilal Patel, Nikos Papastergiadis, Regina Römhild, Stefan Jonsson, and, importantly, Denis Viva, whose generous invitation to co-teach a course on contemporary art and migration as a visiting professor at the University of Trento in Italy in the spring of 2025 gave me some insight into Italian artists' work on migration and displacement, and their differently situated perspectives on European migration policies. I would also like to express my heartfelt gratitude to my husband Peter and our children Johanna and Isak; they have been a lifeline in the long process of researching and writing this book on a difficult and often heart-rending topic.

The dialogue with artists and curators, and their assistance in gaining access to images and documentation of artworks and art projects, should also be recognized, as this has been crucial to the realization of this volume. In addition to the above-mentioned people from Trampoline House, my thanks go to Sara Alberani, Alen Ali-grudić, Khaled Barakeh, Ismar Ćirkinagić, Nermin Duraković, Tina Enghoff, Maja Nydal Eriksen, Kent Klich, Søren Lind, Carlota Mir, Larissa Sansour and Vladimir Tomić.

Most of the manuscript for this book was written during a year's sabbatical leave made possible by a Carlsberg Monograph Fellowship (Grant no. CF23-0909). I would therefore like to extend a special thanks to the Carlsberg Foundation for supporting my work and for providing me with the necessary time for research, reflection and writing as well as funds for linguistic revision of the manuscript and illustrations. The Novo Foundation is also warmly thanked for its support for the publication of the volume with the last funds from a substantial Investigator Grant (Grant no. NNF19OC0053992).

In order for their work to get published, authors depend on professional assistance. I would like to thank the editors of the transcript series Postmigration Studies, Marc Hill and Erol Yildiz, for their confidence that a study of contemporary art could have something important to say about sociocultural experiences of displacement and postmigration. I would also like to thank the anonymous peer reviewer, my production manager at transcript, Annika Linnemann, and copy editor Nicola Gray who worked with me on this volume. I am much obliged to them all for their support.

My final acknowledgements concern the book chapters that include and reconfigure previously published material. Chapter 2 is partly based on the above-mentioned article co-authored with Sabine Dahl Nielsen, 'Enwezor's Model and Copenhagen's Center for Art on Migration Politics', published in a special issue of Nka: Journal of Contemporary African Art (no. 48, 2021) entitled 'Okwui Enwezor: The Art of Curating' and guest edited by Jane Chin Davidson and Alpesh Kantilal Patel. There is also a partial overlap between Chapter 3 and my contribution to The Elgar Companion to the Arts and Global Multiculturalism (2025). That contribution is titled 'The Art of Prefiguration: Building a Future Collectivity at documenta fifteen' and springs from my research for this book, but it shifts the main focus from displacement to discourses on (post)multiculturalism. Chapter 4 is based on my article "'In the First Place, We Don't Like to Be Called 'Refugees'": Dilemmas of Representation and Transversal Politics in the Participatory Art Project 100% FOREIGN?", published in Humanities, vol. 10, no. 4 (2021), a special issue on 'Ethics and Literary Practice II: Refugees and Representation', edited by Michelle Boulous Walker and Adam Zachary Newton. I thank all the editors, journals and publishers for their kind permission to use copyrighted material.
