Preface

Immigration and asylum policy have become the object of intense political disputes in many Member States and at supranational level. Their legal dimension is increasingly influenced by EU directives and regulations on various aspects of border controls, visas, immigration and asylum. For that reason, legal and political debates at national and the European level often revolve around the contents of EU legislation which determines the outcome of court cases throughout the continent and guides national parliaments when adopting domestic rules. After 15 years of legislative activities at EU level, it has become difficult to keep an oversight of the diverse instruments adopted on a variety of topics ranging from visa applications in consulates abroad and border controls at sea over rules on the entry and residence of family members, students, seasonal workers or inter-corporate transferees to reception conditions and procedural guarantees for asylum seekers. This commentary pursues the objective of assisting readers to confront the complexity of supranational legislation.

The publication of a new directive or regulation in the Official Journal is the beginning of an occasionally cumbersome process of implementation, enforcement and adjudication at national and supranational level. It is the purpose of this commentary to support all those involved in different functions and at various levels in the interpretation and application of European rules: judges at domestic courts, officials working for administrative authorities or national ministries, members of civil society, practicing lawyers, civil servants with an EU institution and academics. To support all these readers required the authors to pay attention to both the seemingly technical detail of a specific measure and the grand scheme connecting different instruments. The chapters of this commentary are meant to achieve both in parallel through a combination of four thematic introductions and more specialised sections on no less than 20 different instruments.

In order to provide readers with a comprehensive overview of European immigration and asylum law, this book employs the method of a ‘commentary’ in the German tradition explaining the content and legal context of each legislative instrument article by article. Thus, the chapter on a specific directive or regulation will not usually be read from A to Z like a book. Rather, readers will consult the information on a specific article and will then be re-directed, by means of cross-references, to related information elsewhere in the commentary. By way of example, someone interested in the scope and interpretation of the equal treatment provision in Article 11 Long-Term Residents Directive will open the relevant pages on this article and look for the information he/she requires. In addition, the four thematic introductions provide readers with an outline of overarching legal, constitutional and contextual questions relevant for a better understanding of the policy field as a whole.

We have paid attention to bring together a rich collection of different authors with various backgrounds from across Europe. Some are experienced practitioners with a high expertise in the field they are writing on. Others are senior academics or promising young researchers involved in debates about immigration and asylum. Not all authors contributing to this book share exactly the same opinions on underlying themes. Therefore, different views on overlapping issues of interpretation cannot be excluded. But we are united by the ambition to provide our readers with reliable and in-depth materials on a complex area of the law.

Preface

It is a characteristic of immigration and asylum law that its interpretation is the object of legal and political disputes and disagreements. For that reason, reliability and objectivity are meant to be core features of this commentary which intends primarily to present the law as it stands, while always keeping in mind that existing rules may provide a large scope for divergent interpretation. Whenever there is room for disagreement, existing opinions in the literature shall be presented, possibly together with a proposal by the author how the question should be resolved. In doing so, the contributors participate in the doctrinal reconstruction of the law in line with the continental tradition also in areas where no case law exists so far.

As a transnational undertaking, it is not the purpose of this commentary to give detailed information on how different Member States implemented European rules. It aims, rather, to describe the content of existing European legislation, to identify potential interpretation issues and to provide arguments for applying such rules. Given that the EU is a multilingual polity, we have invited authors to include case law by national courts from across Europe and academic writing in different languages into their line of argument.

We hope that the common methodological concept underlying a commentary article-by-article will be useful for both practitioners and academics working on domestic or supranational immigration and asylum law. Of course, there may be gaps and omissions. The editors and authors therefore appreciate any suggestion how to improve the general scheme or individual chapters in subsequent editions of this book. Acknowledgments

The editors express their gratitude to the assistants of the Chair of European and International Law and the Research Centre for Immigration and Asylum Law at the University of Konstanz. Throughout the preparation of the second edition, Tobias Klarmann, Sigrid Gies and Carolin Beverungen Arévalo invested much time into the project and showed their dedication by editing this commentary. We hope that they will soon complete a successful PhD thesis in the field of refugee law. The editors owe great debt to Sabine Appt who did an excellent coordination work for the first edition. This time-consuming project could not have been completed without the invaluable help provided by the student assistants of the university chair: Greta Baaken, Constanze Bolkart, Christian Goulart Mc Nerney, Stefanie Jetter, Anna Maurer, Jonas Müller, Moritz Raiser, Felicitas Sauerbrei, Sophie Scholl, Fabian Vichtl, Felix Weber and Linda Wischrath. They did a wonderful job in preparing the word files for the commentary and in checking compliance with the style guide. Our contact person with the publisher, Dr. Wilhelm Warth, deserves credit for his reliable and flexible cooperation.
