This book resulted from two events dedicated to ethnographic investigations of mistrust. The first was a panel organized at the 2016 convention of the European Association of Social Anthropologists in Milan, called ‘The Anthropology of Mistrust’. I would like to thank Christian Giordano, one of the very few anthropologists who has taken notice of mistrust, for co-organising this event and sharing his thoughts with me. The second was a conference held at the Friedrich Schiller University Jena (Germany) in November 2017 on ‘Mistrust, Mobilities, Insecurities’. During both events, we jointly managed to take the discussion to another level, and I am greatly indebted to all participants for this. I would like to thank Annika Jooß for her organisational and the EU-funded research project CASCADE for financial support of this conference. My thinking about mistrust has greatly profited from discussions with Silvia Serrano and Bruce Grant, who also helped a lot to draft the blurb.

This publication is generously funded by the OpenAire initiative of the European Commission, aimed to foster open access publications resulting out of EU-sponsored research projects. Special thanks to Pablo de Castro and Gwen Franck from this institution, as well as to Johanna Tönsing and Julia Wiczorek from the publisher transcript for truly great collaboration. The figure depicted on the cover is the Queen from the Lewis Chessmen kept in the British Museum in London. The drawing is taken from the Book “Early Medieval Designs from Britain” by Eva Wilson (page 84), published by Dover Publications (Mineola) in 1987. Many thanks to the publisher for allowing us to reproduce this drawing!

Furthermore, I am greatly indebted to the two anonymous reviewers who provided me with invaluable feedback. Trevor Stack has been so kind as to invite me to the University of Aberdeen to present my first approaches to the anthropology of mistrust – I have greatly failed, but this failure has helped me a lot to refine my thoughts. The same applies to a consecutive lecture I gave at the University of Glasgow after the gracious invitation of Gavin Slade. Matthew Blackburn has contributed excellent copyediting and Han Vermeulen equally excellent translations from German into English. Finally, I would like to thank my PhD students Tatia Khutsishvili and Weronika Zmiejewski for their willingness to consider 'mistrust' as a useful analytical category in various inspiring discussions, as well as Kerstin Klenke for all kinds of support.
