“You have data – we have friends.”

In one of the first courses I attended as a doctoral student, a lively debate erupted between the political scientists and the social anthropologists present. Fully aware that this would trigger a controversy, political scientist Klaus Schlichte raised the accusation that social anthropology is “not based on a reliable database, but only on stories and narratives told by people in the field.” Political sciences, by contrast, work with reliable, objective data, he claimed. Stuart Kirsch, one of the anthropologists participating in the discussion, just raised an eyebrow, smiled mildly and replied, “Well, Klaus, you may have data, but we have friends.”

On the journey of writing this book, I made new friends; existing friendships were strengthened; and a whole series of old and new friends accompanied me along the way, for which I am very grateful. First of all, I would like to thank the lawyers and activists of the Peruvian human rights movement who have placed their trust in me, shared their stories with me, and thereby made this research possible. I would especially like to thank Rosita, Ingrid, and David, who opened the door to their daily work at Fedepaz and who gave me an insight into what it means to work for a human rights organization in Peru. Thank you for your friendship and for your great patience.

I would also like to thank from the bottom of my heart the compañeros and compañeras of the PIC in Celendín, whom I was able to accompany for several months. My special thanks go to Palujo, Milton, Homero, Ramiro, Clavite, Leo, Ramón, and Livaque. In addition, I also thank all the other members of the grassroots movements, the ronderos and ronderas, NGO workers, activists, campesinas, and campesinos who form part of the social movements in the province of Celendín and in the Cajamarca region. These include, in particular, the group of líderes and líderesas from Sorochocho and Celendín, whom I was privileged to accompany for the duration of a trial and who shared their concerns and hopes with me. In Cajamarca, I am especially grateful to Paola, Karina, and Mirtha for making time to answer my questions. Furthermore, my deepest thanks go to Lucy and Homero, who offered me not only a place to stay, but an actual home in Celendín, and to Maruja, Coco, and María, who did the same in Lima.

In Lima, I owe a big thank you to all the lawyers and employees of the various NGOs who took the time for an interview or an informal talk with me. In this context, I would like to especially thank Mar, Juliana, Julio, Maritza, and Joel. They provided me not only with information but also with contacts and background reports, which was very helpful. In addition, I am also very grateful for the support I have received from various academics on site. In particular, I would like to thank Sergio Miguel Huarcaya and Carlos Quispe Dávila for the lively discussions we had and for the helpful advice I received from both of them. Finally, I would also like to thank my interview partners outside Peru, namely in the United States, the United Kingdom, and Germany.

This research was part of the project “Law in Protest: Transnational Struggles for Corporate Liability,” which was funded by the Swiss National Science Foundation and initiated by Julia Eckert. I am deeply grateful to Julia for having accompanied me so closely on the path of this research. In addition, I also thank Stuart Kirsch for being my second supervisor and for all the helpful advice and feedback.

The writing process was long and, especially in the beginning, also quite nerve-racking and exhausting. I was fortunate to be supported during this process by a writing group that included Andrea, Marion, Noah, and Roman. Our time in the seclusion of Calonico, Bratsch, and Prêles was incredibly important to me. Grazie mille!

Many thanks also to Danaé, Kiri, Rahel, and Sabrina and to Anna-Lena, Corinne, Johanna, and Laura for their feedback, their support, and our friendship. And finally, I thank Cumi, Zora, and Mats for being my source of energy and motivation.
