

Acknowledgments

First and foremost, I want to express my deep gratitude to Christa Buschendorf, who inspired this study in more ways than one. It was in classes she taught that I first encountered the work of Pierre Bourdieu and began to study African American literature. Most importantly, however, her dedication to doing research collectively with a group of young scholars to whom she has served as a mentor was encouraging and inspiring—not least because she always made it known to us how much she appreciated our respective contributions to the project of analyzing American culture through the lens of relational sociology.

At Goethe-Universität Frankfurt, I was lucky enough to meet others who have inspired me both scholarly and personally. The work of Johannes Völz was a model of what literary studies can do at its best. He has continually provided critical commentary and advice from which I have greatly benefited over the years. Stephan Kuhl is a much better literary critic than I will ever be, and his scholarship has consistently served as an inspiration for my own attempts at making sense of and writing about American literature.

I have not had a single thought on American culture and society or on Marxian critical theory that does not bear the traces of the ongoing conversation with my collaborators and comrades in academia, Dennis Büscher-Ulbrich and Hendrik Burfeind. Thank you!

Among the many merits of Christa Buschendorf's dedication to collective research was that she brought together several American Studies scholars who regularly met for reading groups in Frankfurt or during week-long seminars at Haus Bergkranz in Riezlern (which she co-organized with her husband, Bernhard Buschendorf). I consider it a great privilege to have been a part of this group which included Nicole Hirschfelder, Johannes Kohrs, Luvena Kopp, Stephan Kuhl, Nicole Lindenbergs, Stefanie Müller (who, moreover, taught the class in which I first read Colson Whitehead), and Wibke Schniedermann. Hanging out with Luvena, Nic, and Stephan for non-academic reasons has always been a pleasure, too.

In 2015 I spent six months as a visiting research scholar at the University of Illinois at Chicago. Walter Benn Michaels was kind enough to act as a host, and I was able to learn a lot from our conversations about art and literature. Jennifer Ashton invited me to present my research to her students for which I am very grateful. By a stroke of luck I visited UIC at the same time as Daniel Zamora, who provided both scholarly inspiration and (with Camille Coletta) great company. And, as much as I enjoyed attending Walter's seminar on American literature, it was great fun to subsequently complain about his inexplicable aversion to Adorno with Luca Delbello each week.

During the five years I spent at the English Department at Christian-Albrechts-Universität zu Kiel, I was fortunate to work with Christian Huck, another scholar committed to collective research. For making Kiel a great place to be, despite my weekly 500-kilometer commute, I am much obliged to him and our fellow re:articulators: Vicki Allen, Rike Köpke, Dennis, and Hendrik.

Throughout my life as an academic I have benefited a lot from talking about my work and theirs with fellow Americanists at conferences or when presenting earlier parts of this study at the American Studies colloquium in Frankfurt. I encountered particularly attentive interlocutors in Tom Clark, Johannes Fehrle, Tim Lanzendorfer, Magda Majewska, and Katharina Motyl. Finally, I immensely enjoyed talking critical theory over lunch with Jesse Ramírez.

I am indebted to my copy editor, Andrew Ascherl, for pointing out stylistic blunders to me. Needless to say, all remaining mistakes are my own. At transcript Luisa Bott was in charge of my book, and I thank both her and Julia Wieczorek for their patience with me.

If it had not been for Paul Lins and Valentino Massoglio and their insistence at the right moment that there is a categorical imperative to overthrow all relations in which human beings are debased, I would not have become the person that I am today. Our regular get-togethers, often with Martin Kuch and Tetsi Pecoraro, contain glimpses of utopia. Discussing sociological theory (and everything else) on the long walks I have been taking with Kambis Zahedi for years has been a delight. Finally, Lea and Andrea Catana have always provided nourishment, both spiritual and material, for which I am deeply thankful.

Words cannot express what I owe to my parents, Susanne and Peter Lieber. I doubt that I would have chosen to study American culture if it had not been for their collection of books and records; nor would I be an academic if it was not for their ongoing and unwavering support. This is why I dedicate this book to them.

I am more than happy that Jule Zecha has been a part of my life since before I wrote my first student paper on Colson Whitehead, and I do not want to imagine a life without her. For her love and support I am deeply grateful. Shortly after I submitted my PhD thesis on which this book is based our daughter Ava Marlene was born. Her curiosity, intelligence, joyfulness, and sass provide pleasures beyond compare.
