

Note of Thanks

A project of this size would not have been possible to realise without a supportive working environment. I would, therefore, like to thank my first and second supervisors, Thomas Heinze and Volker Remmert, for their constant support, helpful tips and critical feedback proffered throughout the project. I would also like to thank Laura Behrmann for our discussions about qualitative and educational research. My thanks also go to Anna Harris for giving me the opportunity to come to Maastricht and for her thoughtful and insightful feedback, offered from a medical educational standpoint. I would like to thank Maximiliane Wilkesmann for taking an interest in my project and for her encouragement. Finally, I would also like to thank all of the aforementioned individuals for taking time out of their busy schedules to serve as members of my PhD committee.

Furthermore, I would like to thank the Wuppertal GRK2696 community and its PIs for their company and valuable feedback provided throughout this journey. Special thanks go to my fellow PhD students, Jan Nicolay, Jeremias Düring, Sarwar Ahmed and Fabienne Grimm, and to the student assistants Verena Senger, Minori Nohara and Philine Higy. I would also like to thank the FASoS community at Maastricht University for their hospitality and open-mindedness. Finally, I would like to thank everyone who provided comments at conferences, workshops or other get-togethers that helped me to both think through and to work on this dissertation down through the years.

A project of this size would also have been impossible without the support of my personal network. All of my family members and friends have now heard about Simulation-Based Training, due to the many questions asked and because of their open ears, as well as my ramblings, whether they wanted to or not. Conversely, as a sociologist interested in professions, I have never liked the term 'work-life balance', as it implies that work is somehow separate from our lives. However, there have been many occasions when it has been wonderful to forget about my PhD work for a while. For this, and for your constant support, I am forever grateful. Luckily, there are too many of you to list, but you know who you are!
