

Acknowledgments

Although there is only one name listed on the cover, this dissertation is the work of a community of inspiring individuals who were gracious and generous enough to support me throughout the past four years. My unending gratitude goes out to every single one of them. Without them, this dissertation would not have been possible, and/or my mental sanity would not have survived somewhat intact.

Without supervision, a dissertation is no more than a good idea. I am incredibly fortunate to have received not only excellent supervision but also continuous feedback, mentoring and encouragement from Margreth Lünenborg over the past few years – both before the dissertation as well as after its submission. I am also very grateful to my second supervisor, Christine Lohmeier, whose comments and feedback towards the end of the dissertation were crucial as I tried to synthesize three years' worth of text fragments, chapters and ideas into a final manuscript. My thanks also go to the remaining members of my doctoral commission: Carola Richter, Anna Litvinenko and especially Maria Löblich, whose support helped to set the groundwork for this project in my master's thesis. It was an honor to have defended and discussed this dissertation with such a panel of experts.

In addition to supervision “from above,” the comments and feedback from my peers proved invaluable throughout the entire dissertation project. Special thanks go to the members of the Journalism Studies Ph.D. colloquium at the Freie Universität Berlin. Your thoughtful responses and our productive discussions helped to shape this dissertation into what it has become. I also want to thank the members of the colloquium, especially Ana-Nzinga Weiß, for our many joint writing sessions and lunch breaks during the final year of the dissertation. Writing this dissertation was much easier knowing that I wasn't alone.

In more practical terms, a dissertation is not possible without substantial financial support. I am very grateful to the Hans-Böckler-Stiftung for this support. In addition to providing for my livelihood, the Hans-Böckler-Stiftung supported multiple conference trips as well as a six-week research stay in Namibia. My thanks go to my academic advisor Sebastian Köhler as well as to Iris Henkel and Patrick Tschirner from the doctoral funding department for their help during this process. A special shout-out goes to my fellow scholarship recipients in Berlin, especially Leonie Benker, for our conversations, commiseration and numerous funding reports over the past few years. It was a privilege to meet so many impressive doctoral students through the Hans-Böckler-Stiftung. Our discussions have greatly enriched this dissertation and helped me to think outside the box of my disciplinary confines.

Finally, this dissertation was made possible by many patient archivists and librarians. I am very grateful to the library at the Basler Afrika Bibliographien, especially Reto Ulrich, who not only helped me with my numerous media orders but also provided me with useful advice for my research trip to Namibia. Much of this dissertation hinges on the six weeks that I spent in Namibia and on the wonderfully kind staff at the National Library of Namibia, who brought up mountains of newspapers from the basement (despite a non-functioning elevator!) and were very helpful in answering all my questions. I want to especially thank the journalists who were kind enough to speak to me for this project and to open up about the process of writing about the genocide: Jemima Beukes, Kuzeeko Tjitemisa, Charmaine Ngatjiheue and Kae Maṭunḍu-Tjiparuro. Kae Maṭunḍu-Tjiparuro not only generously spoke to me of his various experiences in the Namibian media system but also continued to supply me with invaluable information after our initial contact ended. It was clear in our conversations that the questions I probe in the following pages are not just academic and theoretical but rather real-life challenges that many people before and after me have fought to bring to attention. I can only hope that I have been able to do some justice to those challenges while acknowledging that the conversation is far from over.

In addition to the practical and the professional, my unending gratitude goes to my parents for their support and love throughout these last years. And last but very certainly not least: Thank you, Alex. Words cannot begin to do justice to your support during this process. You have read every chapter not once, but multiple times. You have patiently listened to every half-baked thought and late-night fear. You are the quiet reassurance that tells me I can when I am certain I cannot. For that, and everything else, I thank you with all my heart.
