

Acknowledgements

I would like to express my heartfelt thanks to everyone who helped me with this thesis.

I would especially like to thank my advisor, Martin Saar, for his encouragement and suggestions regarding Foucault and theories of power, which provided me with valuable insights. Studying under his guidance and supervision has been a great privilege and joy. I would also like to thank my second supervisor, Jonas Heller. His seminar on human rights and the state of exception inspired many of the ideas in this thesis.

I am also grateful to my classmates in the Kolloquium Sozialphilosophie and all the teachers from whose insightful lectures I have benefited at Goethe-Universität Frankfurt, especially Sebastian Odzuck, whose seminar on the concept of techne in Plato and Aristotle was extremely helpful. I am grateful, too, to Montserrat Herrero, whose research on concrete order thinking has deepened my understanding of Plato's Nomoi. I would also like to thank Simon Gurish and Christoph Menke for their seminars on legal philosophy and Lorenz Rumpf for his lessons in ancient Greek, which helped me better understand ancient texts.

I would also like to acknowledge my friends. In particular, I would like to thank David Thoma, Xingyu Duan, Hanchen Li, and Yu Song. I benefited greatly from our philosophical discussions. I also fondly remember the Plato and Proclus reading club held by Harald and Nadja Vajkonny, which enhanced my understanding of Plato's philosophy.

I am also grateful to Daniel Ekpo-Bassey and D. Potter, who helped me tremendously with my English writing.

Acknowledgements

I would also like to thank Studierendenwerk Frankfurt, whose staff helped me solve problems related to residence while I was writing this thesis.

Finally, I would like to express my sincere gratitude to my family, especially my parents, and my friends.